

REPORT

WORK VALUES TEST

Gender: Male

Age: 21

Report Work Values Test

Table of contents

Table of contents 1

Work values test result 2

- Your work values summary in order of score 3
- Typical value profiles 4
- Values and corporate culture 5

Work values test result

It is known from scientific research that there are fourteen work values that can be considered fundamental. If you have work in which the work values that you believe are important have ample room, the chance that you will be successful and happy in your work will increase. The extent to which you believe each of the fourteen values is important is reflected in this report.

Your work values summary in order of score

Below you will find a list with work values in order from what is most important to what is least important for you. The values that are most important to you, though sometimes also those that are least important to you, characterize the things that you consider to be genuinely important or unimportant in work.

1. Structure
2. Working conditions
3. Work-life balance
4. Financial reward
5. Security
6. Prestige
7. Performance
8. Variety
9. Influence
10. Work relationships
11. Altruism
12. Creativity
13. Self-development
14. Autonomy

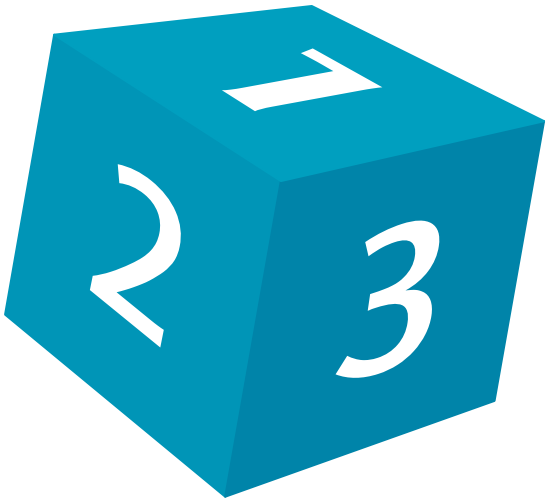

This ordered list of your work values was calculated by comparing your results with thousands of others who completed the test. To view your exact scores and detailed explanations of all work values, a full extended report is available.

Typical value profiles

Although each person is a unique individual, meaning that any and every combination of scores will occur, there are values that are related to others, rendering profiles that are more common. Statistical analysis indicates that there are at least four distinguishable clusters of values that are more related to one another than to the other values. These clusters can be inconsequentially referred to as 'ambitious', 'independent', 'conventional' and 'people-minded'. With a bit of imagination, the clusters can be described as prototype value profiles. For the record, the chance that one person specifically satisfies one of these profiles is minimal. Each person has a specific value pattern. It is therefore important for you to relate the various work values to which you assign much or only little importance to one another. To view your scores on these typical values profiles, a full extended report is available.

Values and corporate culture

Each and every organization has a specific corporate culture. It is possible to regard this culture as the common denominator between everyone in the company in terms of what day-to-day life is like. All kinds of rules, which are sometimes explicit but are often implicit too, govern the people's conduct towards one another as well as their conduct towards external partners (e.g. customers). The core of the corporate culture is usually formed by the prevalent values (including work values). Those values are often very explicit in the symbols, heroes, and rituals that a company might have.

1
2
3